Good evening everyone,

Thank you for the warmth in this room. After the brilliant words from our Best Man and Chief Bridesmaid, I just want to say a few from the heart.

To our families — the Khans and the Whitmores — thank you for everything that brought us to today. You've fed us, steadied us, and somehow made this all look easy. To our wedding party and all our friends who travelled, wrangled schedules, and cheered us on — you've made this day feel like home. And to every guest here, your laughter and presence mean more to us than we can say.

James and I met at a photography workshop in Manchester, both trying to catch the same patch of light. We've been chasing good light ever since — four years of it. Our first weekend away in York taught me that the best plan is sometimes a slow walk and a shared pastry. We adopted a rescue cat who believes we are staff. And on a sunrise cycle, with the city just waking below us, he asked a question that made the morning brighter than it already was.

James, you are thoughtful, patient, and quietly funny — the kind of funny that sneaks up and changes the whole day with one line. You make me braver. I like to think I bring the colour and the scribbles; you bring the space where they can live. Together we're resilient and a bit adventurous — which, in our case, looks like canal rides in questionable weather, board game nights that run long, and hunting down the best flat white within a five-mile radius.

To everyone who has loved us into this moment — thank you.

And to my husband, James — I can't wait for all the ordinary days we'll turn into something unforgettable.
